

Main Finding:

Men struggle with correctly perceiving domestic abuse when they are the victims; and therefore also struggle with handling or solving it.

Society doesn't ignore the abuse that men undergo at the hands of women, but rather it attempts to dictate how men perceive and handle it

The Blank Papers - Examining Men & Their De-legitimized Victimhood (Volume One)

A research paper written by: Shawn Hamlet

Introduction:

Domestic abuse has its own history surrounding women being the primary victims but this project analyzes men's plight with their own victimhood.

Literature Review:

Scholars have discussed the reasons why data is limited regarding men experiences with domestic abuse and why it is discovered as illegitimate. Most of the reports suggest that data is limited because men are not reporting the abuse.

Analysis:

Examining written documents of men that have been examined by professional individuals reveal that men aren't reporting the abuse because they have an incorrect perception of what abuse is and how it should be addressed.

Conclusion:

I suspect that one of the reasons why men aren't able to correctly identify domestic abuse at the hands of women is because society writes off the act of abuse as a personality trait of women instead of a reprehensible trait.
